Fall 2003 Workshop #6

Power and Politics

November 19, 2003

Agenda

1:00 – 2:55 pm	Power and Politics
1:00 – 2:00	Presentation V. Rabinowitz & V. Valian
We skipped Activity 1 because the presentation led to a productive, but unscheduled, group discussion	Activity 1: Break into groups of 4-5 Academic life is full of challenges that extend beyond teaching and research. Bureaucratic and political problems can consume a lot of your time and energy, and may affect your work. We have listed below three categories of “power problems” that may occur here at Hunter or in any academic setting. In a group of 4-5, discuss one problem from the list below. Try not to dwell on the problem itself, but rather focus on the best way to address the problem. Is the problem one that can be addressed at the individual level, or will it require an institutional change or group effort? Who would be your best allies to help solve the problem (fellow faculty, department chair, dean, etc.)? How can you frame the problem in a way that will be non-threatening to others while also inspiring them to help? Problem#1: Unresponsive college staff (technical support, administrative support, other college office) Problem #2: Your space does not suit your needs Problem #3: You have received an unsatisfactory teaching schedule
	Report back to the main group: Lessons learned from Activity 1
2:00 – 2:20	Activity 2: Break into groups of 4-5 Although dealing effectively with individuals who occupy positions of power comprises a large part of power and politics, navigating the power structure in academia also entails knowing how to build your own power. There are many ways to increase your prestige and visibility not only within your own department but also within the college as a whole. For each person in your group, generate one concrete suggestion for how she can increase her power either within her department or within the college. We suggest focusing on a project or issue that not only advances personal interests, but also benefits the department or college in some way. For example, volunteering to organize a short colloquium series may not require a large amount of work on your part but will be noticed and appreciated by others. Projects of this nature can also serve as valuable negotiating tools (more on this at our next workshop).
2:20 – 2:55	Report back to the main group: Lessons learned from Activity 2
2:55 – 3:00	Workshop Evaluation: Complete part I before leaving
